

Linor Kiknadze was born in Kazakhstan, grew up in Israel, and currently lives in London. Linor holds a master's degree in Economics from Tel Aviv University. As a researcher, she spent over a decade working on a variety of projects at the Center for the Economics of Human Development under James Heckman at the University of Chicago. She has a particular interest in human capital skill formation and its relationship to inequality and social mobility. Linor had the privilege to join Aaron Institute recently and is excited to make a difference in shaping public policy in Israel.
